Daniel Skinner, Ph.D., is Assistant Professor of Health Policy in the Department of Social Medicine at Ohio University’s Heritage College of Osteopathic Medicine, in Dublin, Ohio. His scholarly interests include health care politics and policy; the politics of medicine and disease; hospital-community relations; health care for vulnerable and underserved populations; feminist theory and gender politics; and medical rhetoric.

At present, he is working on two books currently under contract with university presses. The first, The Politics of Medical Necessity, explores the political dynamics and power relations at work in determining what is (and is not) considered medically necessary in American health care. The second, entitled Medical Urbanism and co-authored with sociologist colleagues from Ohio University (Berkeley Franz, Ph.D.) and the University of Massachusetts (Jonathan Wynn, Ph.D.), is a three city study of how hospitals change the urban environments in which they are located.

Dr. Skinner is Associate Editor for the Americas for the journal Critical Public Health, Program Director for Ohio University’s Cuba Comparative Health Systems Program, and a scholar-activist with interests that include the promotion of health care access and single-payer health care advocacy. Skinner’s research has appeared in journals including Public Administration Review; The Review of Politics; Polity; New Political Science; The Journal of Medical Humanities, The Journal of Health Care for the Poor and Underserved, and The Journal of the American Board of Family Medicine, among others.
