

Training Osteopathic Primary Care Educators (TOPCE): An Osteopathic Clinical Faculty Development Program

PROGRAM INFORMATION: The American Association of Colleges of Osteopathic Medicine's Office of Medical Education will be holding two Faculty Development Programs entitled "Training Osteopathic Primary Care Educators." Eight-hours of education will be held on Sunday, Oct. 30. Four hours are set for 9:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m., Monday morning. These sessions are designed for osteopathic physicians interested in pursuing a career in education, for DO's looking for career development in osteopathic academia and for advancing osteopathic concepts in osteopathic medical education. The eight hour faculty development program on Sunday is in a more expanded format. Many of these talks on educational topics of interest to osteopathic physicians interested in education will be repeated in a more condensed form during the four hour program on Monday. Participants are encouraged to attend the full program on each day, but may opt to attend selected portions of the program.

Eight hours of faculty development Category 1-A CME will be provided for the Sunday program and four for the Monday program. The programs are free and open to all OMED registrants. Although there will be no registration fee for the program, attendees will need to cover their own travel and hotel expenses. The program is directed toward clinical COM OGME faculty who may have an interest in pursuing additional training for a career in medical education.

BACKGROUND: The proposed faculty development program, Training Osteopathic Primary Care Educators: Fulfilling the Philosophy (TOPCE), has been designed by osteopathic educational leaders to assist the osteopathic profession's educational system sustain its philosophy and primary care traditions. Historically, the osteopathic tradition has been characterized both by its practice and its unique contribution to medical education. In that tradition, the osteopathic medical community is one of generalist physicians whose practice is framed by a specific set of osteopathic principles of health and healing and supported by skills in manual medicine. These osteopathic principles and practices (OP&P) distinguish osteopathic medicine.

TOPCE is specifically focused on increasing faculty skills in integrating osteopathic principles and practice in all primary care medical education. As a national faculty development initiative, it will complement existing faculty development programs and enhance the ability of the profession to maintain its tradition of broadly training osteopathic physicians to work within healthcare systems, and to be comfortable providing care for people in many different environments.
